The increase in the prices of oil has brought the world to its senses. Governments are searching for a suitable alternative, but so far in vain. They are considering how they can make better use of the two other major fuels, coal and natural gas, but they have found that neither of them can take the place of oil in their economies. In recent years there has been a growing concern for the environment and coal is not a popular fuel with environmentalists. Coal mines are ugly and their development has a serious effect on animal and plant life; coal itself is a heavy pollutant. Natural gas, the purest of three fuels, is also the most limited in supply.

Some children have difficulties with their bones or their muscles. They may not be able to walk or talk or write in the same way as other children. These children are physically handicapped. But with some help they can go to school and study the same subjects as their friends and take the same examinations.

Other children may not be physically handicapped but may have difficulties in thinking and reasoning. These children are mentally handicapped. With these children two things are important: Firstly their family has to accept that the child has a handicap and secondly society has to agree that these children need special schools.

In these schools the children can be taught how to live their own lives; this is called learning social skills. They learn how to do simple things like find their own clothes, dress themselves, hold a paintbrush. The lessons are not like those in other schools. Students may make a shop as part of a lesson in order to learn about money and how to count. Many parents think that after a few years their child will get better. The problem is that a physical or mental handicap is not like an illness from which it is possible to recover. If these children can learn to look after themselves and live at ease with other people, the school and the teacher will be successful.
